Abstract

This paper explores the archetypal quest story, The Odyssey and its reflections in two contemporary texts: the science fiction television series Star Trek: The Next Generation and the novel The Persephoniad. Both texts reflect the influence of Homer's Odyssey in their use of the archetypal quest narrative, the journey of the hero/heroine, and the theme of homecoming. Characters from each text undertake journeys that are both external and internal, and as the hero/heroine of each text journeys outward, he/she also journeys inward. Each text also reflects the influence of the Odyssey in its use of the archetypal quest narrative, the journey of the hero/heroine, and the theme of homecoming. Characters from each text undertake journeys that are both external and internal, and as the hero/heroine of each text journeys outward, he/she also journeys inward. The Persephoniad is a story of "departure and return."

Apparently published appendices to Homer's Odyssey (Kirk 1962), the Homeric Hymns are a collection of thirty-three poems in dactylic hexameter that were composed by anonymous poets in ancient Greece. Each poem is dedicated to a god or goddess and is a hymn of praise to that deity. Although the Homeric Hymns are attributed to Homer, they were probably composed by many different poets over a period of several centuries. The Homeric Hymns are a valuable source of information about ancient Greek religion, myth, and culture. They are also a beautiful example of ancient Greek poetry.
